

Fragments

by Olivia Lee

Sappho wrote about 10,000 lines of poetry in her lifetime. From this body of work, approximately 650 lines survive as fragments, and only one poem is complete: The Ode to Aphrodite. Little is known of her life, except through her poetry and the records of Ancient Historians – knowledge they also gathered from her writing. Her poetry explored personal identity and the experience of emotions, often as a physical reaction; some poems addressed individuals. Ancient authors claim she wrote primarily of love, and erotic themes are certainly found in the fragments that remain.

Sappho was often regarded as “the 10th Muse” and “the Poetess.”

Fragments is inspired by Sappho’s history and body of work. My writing is mostly about those topics of personal identity, the experience of memories, emotion manifested as something physical, and love from many angles. What would my work look like, if all that remained were a small number of lines, perhaps mistranslated and misunderstood? How would my writing look if it were manifested as some fragmented, probabilistic version of itself? Would meaning be lost to time... to the algorithm?

Fragments is composed from my collected creative writing, segmented into sentences and used to train a character-level Markov chain (N=6) that generates new text. The Markov chain produces fragmented poems, stopping once it reaches the same total number of lines as the original text.

from shoestrings import TextGenerator
from shoestrings.tokenizers import SimpleWordTokenizer, SimpleCharacterTokenizer
import sentenceex
text = open("./olee_writing_dirty.txt").read() sentences = sentenceex.segment("\n", text) sentences = [item.replace("\n", " ") for item in sentences
              if len(item.strip()) > 0] char_gen = TextGenerator(n=6, tokenizer=SimpleCharacterTokenizer(), source=sentences)
line_count = 0
frag_count = 0
num_lines = len(sentences)

while line_count < num_lines:
    print(frag_count)
    print("\r")
    for i in range(random.randrange(1,12,1)):
        if line_count >= num_lines:
        else:
            print(char_gen.generate_one(temperature=5, max_ tokens=100))
            line_count += 1
